Crisis Intervention Team

An Effective Response to Mental Illness in Corrections

Our nation's jails, prisons, and community corrections agencies are confronted daily with substantial numbers of persons with mental illness who are in custody and under supervision. Mental illness in corrections demands an urgency of response, services, and care. Some agencies, in partnership with stakeholder communities, have implemented a Crisis Intervention Team (CIT). This team approach involves the community, frontline law enforcement, and corrections agencies in a collaborative effort to address this growing problem. CITs are effective in enhancing the knowledge and skills of correctional staff, aiding administrators in improved management and care for a special population, reducing liability and cost, improving community partnerships for increased access to resources and supports, and increasing safety for all. Participants will be able to:

- Describe the core elements of CITs.
- Describe the benefits of CITs for correctional staff, community stakeholders, persons with mental illnesses, and local criminal justice and mental health agencies.
- Identify ways to sustain a systemwide CIT program that is supported by key stakeholders and that includes active community involvement.
- Assess agency readiness to start a CIT program and identify resources for implementation.
